Sustainability to Anime Mania - 5 Toy Trends taking over in 2024

The Toy Association of America, during its 2024 Toy Trends Briefing, unveiled the trends to watch this year, ranging from sustainability to anime mania. Families are continuing to be mindful about toy spending in 2024 as inflation continues to weigh on budgets for consumers everywhere. In response, several toy makers are launching or expecting to launch new products in popular lines that offer more flexibility in price points, such as creating travel-sized games.

Toy makers are also emphasising product accessibility across all ages abilities. For example, Rubik's Cube - which is celebrating 50 years of business this year - plans to release a new Rubik's Sensory Cube designed with visually-impaired consumers in mind. Each coloured side will have a distinguishable raised pattern, allowing a new group of kids and adults to participate in the game.

Here's a glance at the top five trends to watch:

Sustainability: It's a trend that has been sweeping over just about every product category, and now it's firmly made its way into the toy world. Parents more than ever are paying attention to the materials used in the toys they purchase. According to the Toy Association, 45 percent of parents under the age of 40 consider the environmental impact of a toy when making buying decisions. Wooden toys like those from Melissa & Doug or Bababoo and Friends will be highly sought after this year.

Eerie Enchantment: Interest in all things spooky is now officially on the radar for toy makers. With the popularity of "Wednesday," a supernatural comedy Netflix series that set viewing records, toy makers are capitalizing on everything in the spooky, horror and mystery genres. Toys that focus on new technology, hidden features, secret codes and other elements made popular through the genres will be on the rise. "Wednesday" is also the 2024 License to Watch, according to the Toy Association.

Holistic Play: Dubbed "Vitamin P(lay)," this trend focuses on toys that offer skill-building during playtime as 51 percent of parents consider whether a toy promotes wellness during play, according to the Toy Association. In addition, parents are looking for toys that offer something extra to the imagination - 67 percent of parents look for STEAM elements in a toy, 59 percent look for toys that help with life skills such as cooking or maintenance, and 49 percent look for toys that help emphasize social skills.

All About Anime: Once a very niche form of entertainment, anime has stepped into the mainstream in recent years. More than one in four parents are likely to purchase a toy based on an anime or gaming franchise and it is for that reason that toy makers are looking to take on more anime licenses. Entry-level anime franchises, such as "Naruto" or "One Piece," offer easier to follow storylines that appeal to a wide range of consumers.

Social Media and Edutainment: Social media and gaming platforms, such as Roblox, are continuing to inspire toy and games across the board. Brands that focus on edutainment - combining education and entertainment - will also see more growth as digital creator names like Ms. Rachel and Cocomelon remain fan favorites for parents.■
